

I don't believe that the FCC should change the restrictions on how much one particular company can own within a market. Changing these limits may result in a monopoly of a particular slant of news reporting, entertainment and advertising.

If this should happen, the public will not have as much variety in programming. It would be like being able to only shop at Target, or being able to only get two particular brands of jeans, for example. Not very interesting and only beneficial for the few companies who can afford to buy up the stations.

We already have Microsoft, do we need another monopoly on the airwaves?